Upaya Tata Kelola Lingkungan di Cina: Hambatan-hambatannya

Abstract

This paper examines environment management in China in order to create clean and healthy environment despite its enormous development. Pollution of air, land and water has prevailed throughout most of China which brought about a diverse set of social and political contexts. China began to manifest an awareness of environmental problems in the early of 1970's; nevertheless, the environment quality is not getting better. Paper argues that there are three constraints that have to face. First, environment issues are marginal, put behind economic development. Second, decentralization has made local government act independently. Environment commitments designed at central level are implemented differently at locals. Third, there is not enough public control on policy implementation due to highly dependent of environment NGOs to the government.
