Abstract

This study analyzes how local government, in this case the Government of Malang City, responds to the threat of ISIS' global terrorism. The field research finds that the Government of Malang City integrates persuasive and repressive approaches. The persuasive approach focuses on promoting socialization to the local communities, while the repressive one is conducted through, for example, arresting ISIS affiliates who have been convicted of committing crime. In addition, public and private sectors collaboration is also promoted. They demonstrate the implementation of hybrid security governance model which is relevant to apply the comprehensive security governance in the context of both national and global responses to the ISIS' threat.
