Abstract

This article explains why the United States of America (US) receives China Sovereign Wealth Fund (SWF) investment that targets U.S. strategic sectors. Strategic sectors are strictly protected and foreign government-controlled investments are not allowed. To answer this question, this article uses the concept of global saving glut and theory of lender of last resort. Based on the concept and theory used, it could be concluded that the reason the US receiving China SWF investments in strategic sectors is due to the decreasing independence of the US government in determining investment in strategic sectors. It caused by the role of government that runs most of its function as lender of last resort at domestic level while at international level the role of IMF also decreasing as lender of last resort because most of IMF creditors are western countries who also in crises.
